Vocabulary: partying 词汇: 派对狂欢

Brazilians certainly know how to throw a party – but will Rio be ready to welcome over 10,000 athletes and all the international visitors to the 2016 Olympics?

At the moment, some natives of Rio (known locally as 'Cariocas') aren't too enthusiastic about the Games. They know they'll be putting up with a lot more roadworks and infrastructure building before the Olympic torch is lit in the Maracanã Stadium next August.

Brazilians learnt a lot from hosting the 2014 World Cup

Delays in venue construction gave the International Olympic Committee a fright in 2014. The government has since cleaned up its act and was praised recently for being "on the right track", although the challenge of cleaning up the highly polluted waters of the Rodrigo de Freitas Lagoon and Guanabara Bay – venues for the sailing and rowing competitions – remains.

Fortunately, Brazil has learnt a lot from hosting the World Cup in 2014. Some businesses realised they were missing a trick by not communicating well with their international customers. Restaurants now know that using the internet to translate the menu isn't always a good idea: 'bife a cavalo' isn't really 'horse steak' – it's beef with a fried egg on top!

Security was a key challenge in 2014 – and during the Olympics, the police will be working hard to prevent street crime. As with other developing countries, crime rates are high, and visitors will be encouraged to keep their wits about them so as to avoid falling victim to pickpockets or muggers.

So while the Cariocas are already becoming athletes – by jumping and running across construction sites on their daily commute – they know that the Games have the potential to be a great spectacle, they will be able to let their hair down, and international visitors will have a good time in their company.

Even those Brazilians who have their reservations, know deep down something that others don't. An old local saying goes: 'Deus é Brasileiro' ('God is Brazilian'). They hope he will give them a hand to make the games a success. And you can be sure that whatever happens – or doesn't happen – Brazilians will show the world why they have such a reputation as party people!

答案

1. 阅读课文并回答问题。

1. Why are some people from Rio unhappy about hosting the Olympics?

They have to deal with a lot of construction work in their city.

2. True or false? The government has cleaned the Rodrigo de Freitas Lagoon at the request of the IOC.

False. Cleaning the Lagoon will be a challenge, but the article doesn't say that they have done it already.

3. How did some Rio restaurants confuse international customers during the World Cup?

They used the internet to translate their menus, but some of the resulting names were confusing.

4. Which word in the article means 'regular travel between home and workplace'?

'Commute'. It's used as a noun in the article but can also be a verb.

5. Who do Brazilians say will help guarantee success at Rio 2016?

There is a saying that 'God is Brazilian', and many people believe he will help them.
